Due Diligence Report: PKGM Surges on Acquisition News

Summary:

Pocket Games, Inc., a development stage company, develops, markets, and sells interactive games for mobile devices, tablets, and computers. The company offers Idol Hands, a PC game. It also provides outsourced application development services. The company was founded in 2013 and is based in Far Rockaway, New York.

Pocket Games, Inc. is a new force in Video Games, aiming to bring together some of the industries key and influential figures to create a Company that delivers the very best in PC and Mobile gaming to the fast growing gaming community. The Company modus operandi is to acquired fantastic IP, build brands around that IP and bring other Companies into the fold, in order to have a powerful base from which to succeed. It has already acquired its first IP in Idol Hands, a PC game that is due to be launched in Q1 2015. Plans are already underway to take the title to other platforms to maximize the exposure of the IP and to build a strong revenue base from which to work.

Having been approved by the SEC in April 2014 and granted access to the Public Markets in June 2014 it intends to apply for membership of the influential OTC QB tier of membership of the OTC Markets in due course. The Company has undergone an A Round of funding and is seeking to open a B Round in Q2 2015. The Company completed the DTC process in June 2014 and is DWAC eligible. It trades under the symbol PKGM.

Recent News and Analysis:

Most recently, Pocket Games Inc. announced that it has completed its previously announced acquisition of Viximo, a social games platform, for $3.5 million in preferred stock. Viximo connects game developers to sales channels in difficult to reach markets through its write once, deploy everywhere platform. Once onboarded to the Viximo platform, social mobile games can be deployed across several stores worldwide, providing vastly expanded user reach to game developers in the West. The Viximo toolset also enables developers to increase user engagement and monetization as well as offering localization options. These markets account for over 70% of global app-store market spend annually.

This news has pushed PKGM up 183% in the last two days. One possible reason for the investors' enthusiasm about PKGM is the PR that the company released. The news that the company has completed the acquisition of Viximo seems to have contributed to the overall excitement, but one look at the company's charts reveals that PKGM's ascent actually began the session that preceded the announcement. So what caused this latest surge? The long and short of it is that the answer to that question is unclear. There are no other significant developments related to PKGM, no pump campaigns – not even social media activity targeting the ticker. In short – the jump that we are seeing now seems to have begun without a good reason. The fact that PKGM has issued convertible notes that can be turned into shares of its common stock at a 40-49% discount last year doesn't add to the company's credibility, or the ticker's chances of continuing its surge, either. True, the debt was just $93 thousand, but it is sort of indicative of the way PKGM does business. Factoring this into investor calculations is perhaps now more important than ever, as since PKGM's 10-K for 2015 hasn't hit the web yet investors currently have no way to know the exact state of the company's affairs

Conclusions:

Viximo is a company that is supposed to be heavily involved with the social media, yet its Facebook and Twitter profiles seem to be abandoned. Its own website hasn't been updated for quite a while as well. It says, for example, that Dale Strang is Viximo's CEO, yet, if you take a look at Mr. Strang's LinkedIn profile, you'll see that he left the company in 2012. You'll stumble upon an article which says that also in 2012, Viximo's "core team" was acquired by a company called Tapjoy. According to PKGM's press releases, the social gaming platform is now headed by Michael Pope who has only briefly mentioned this position in his LinkedIn resume. Basically, the internet is not exactly overflowing with information on Viximo's current state of affairs, and things are not looking much better when it comes to PKGM. The small OTC Company recently missed the deadline for its own 10-K which means that the latest set of figures are now quite old. This is basically why investors need to proceed with caution when dealing with PKGM, and keep an ear close to the ground, as when the above mentioned delayed 10-K hits the web, if it does at all, it will dictate PKGM's chart movements in the immediate future.
